Editorial Review

Review

"In this reissue of a book that was hailed as groundbreaking almost as soon as it was published, the authors examine the role of trade unionism and the working class in the development of Egyptian nationalism during the first half of the twentieth century. Beinin and Lockman examine "the dialectic of class and nation and the formation of a new class of wage workers as Egypt experienced a particular kind of capitalist development...and these workers' adoption of various forms of consciousness, organization, and collective action in a political and economic context structured by the realities of foreign domination and the struggle for national independence."

From the Back Cover

"This is one of the first studies in the English language of the Egyptian working class and certainly the most comprehensive of any study including those written in Arabic. . . . It presents a rich overview of a topic that has been largely neglected or treated in polemical fashion by Arab and non-Arab scholars alike. The combined efforts of the two authors have resulted in a wealth of new data that makes this book a path-breaking work. All students of labor history will find it of great interest."--Eric M. Davis, Rutgers University
